"SALADA" TEA

ORANGE PEKOE BLEND

"Pekoe" comes from the Chinese word "Pak-he", meaning silver hair, which was applied to the tip leaves on the Chinese tea bush. Tip leaves are wiry in shape. In India they were more orange in colour, so were called "Orange Pekoe" (Pak-he). sse

For 500,000,000 Years!

Geologists say that if we could make a great film showing in proportion the successive geological periods with the appropriate plants and animals and scenery for each successive age, and could arrange to unwind the whole film in, say, fourteen hours, beginning at ten in the morning, man would begin to appear on the film about ten minutes before midnight! Organic evolution has been proceeding slowly for far more than five hundred million years, so we must not expect to see very much change in a lifetime.—Prof. J. A. Thomson.

RICHMOND TOWNSHIP S. S. CONVENTION

The annual Sunday School Convention of Richmond Township convened at Selby in the United Church on Friday, June 22nd, with President Geo. H. Brooks, presiding. The convention comprised representatives from Napanee, Selby, Roblin, Empey Hill, Forest Mills and West Plain.

Two sessions were held. The afternoon was the opening one. This was opened by devotional exercises led by Rev. A. E. Oliver, of Roblin. Mr. Stewart Mowers, assistant superintendent of Selby S. S. gave an address of welcome to the visitors. Reports were then received from the various Department Superintendents, and from the Secretary-Treasurer. Mr Will Frisken. As each report was presented, Rev. W. A. Dobson, B.A., of Bethany United Church, Ottawa, representing the O.R.E.C. headquarters, reviewed the work done, and led in discussion of problems arising out of the same. Mrs. Robert Marlin rendered a much appreciated solo.

The evening session was commenced by a song service, conducted by Rev. A. E. Oliver, after which Rev. Harry Pawson, of Trinity United Church, Napanee, conducted devotional exercises. The report of the Nominating Committee was then presented by Mr. Will Frisken and adopted unanimously. By this action the following are the officers for next year:

President—Mr. Chas. Anderson Selby.
Vice-Pres—Mr. J. C. Hudgins, Selby.
Sec'y-Treas—Mrs. Adam Frisken, Selby.
Supt of Children's Work—Mrs. R. J. Smith, Napanee
Supt. of Girls' Work—Miss Laura Rockwell, Napanee.
Supt of Boys' Work—Rev. W. P. Woodger, B.A. Napanee.
Supt of Adult Division—Mr. W. J. Winter, Selby.
Supt. of Young People's Dept. —Mrs. John Kimmett, Roblin.
Supt. of Home Dept.—Mrs. S. Waddell, Roblin.
Supt of Teacher Training—Rev. A. J. Wilson, B.A., B.D., Napanee.
Supt. of Missionary Dept.—Miss Mabel Stafford, Empey Hill.

Supt. of Temperance Dept.—Mrs. Nathan B. Milner, Napanee.

Rev. A. J. Wilson installed the officers. The Resolution Committee presented two resolutions which were adopted by the convention, namely:

(a) That we recommend that each local Sunday School take a collection at least once a year and pass it on to the Township Convention Treasurer to provide a fund to be used at the discretion of the Township Temperance Superintendent to furnish suitable literature for the local Sunday Schools.

(b) That we recommend that the Sunday Schools of the Townships subscribe for sufficient copies of the Northern Messenger for those who will enter the Scientific Temperance Contest according to the plan promoted by John Dougall & Sons, of Montreal, and that these subscriptions be forwarded not later than July 15th.

Mr. Ted Wilde sang a solo, after which Rev. W. A. Dobson gave an address upon "The Sunday School's True Evangelism." Everybody is questioning how the next revival of religion is to take place. The Church School presents the most effective means for promiting this. Opportunity is very apparent through the decadence of home religion, the impulse of the general public concerning Professional Evangelism, and the fact that the Church School has the machinery to do the work. As of old, when the command was given to Moses, "speak unto the children of Israel that they go forward," guidance with help was promised from God, so now if we are only brave to assume our responsibilities, we will be guided by His Spirit, and unbelief be His Strength.

Tea was served between the sessions by the ladies of Selby church, for the visiting delegates, in which their culinary reputation was amply maintained. Next year's convention will be held in Grace Church, Napanee.

DISTRICT ANNUAL CONVENTION OF THE INSTITUTE OF LENNOX COUNTY

The thirty-first district annual meeting of the Women's Institute of Lennox County, met in Odessa Town Hall on Wednesday, June 20th, at 10 a.m. The able president Mrs. Miller, was in the chair. The meeting opened with the singing of the Ode, followed by the Lord's Prayer in unison.

It was decided that Mrs. Raymond Fretts, of Maple Leaf branch act as press reporter for the meeting. The president then welcomed Mrs. J. D. Shibley, of Harrowsmith, and Mr. Laughland Agricultural Representative of Napanee and those present waited in pleasant anticipation for the time to come when these two should address them.

The Address of welcome was very nicely given by Mrs. Smith, president of Odessa Institute. In closing she said she hoped to hear discussed at this meeting two vital questions, namely: maternal mortality and co-operation of Institutes with schools and teachers. She expressed pleasure at being able to include in her welcome for the first time at a district meeting, a Junior Institute.

Mrs. Reid Roblin, of Adolphustown, very ably replied to the welcome and gave us many beautiful thoughts to store in memory. She closed with a poem of Henry Burdykes' found in our P. S. readers, "Let me do my work from day to day," etc.

The president then gave a very concise and interesting address. She announced that this district had decided not to join Frontenac in exhibiting flowers at their fall fairs, but to confine exhibits to Napanee and Odessa fairs for the present. She said there were ten senior branches and one junior branch in the district, and all were represented at the meeting. She traced the growth of Women's Institutes from the first Institute at Stoney Creek, Ont., until now there are 1070 Institutes in Ontario and over 2000 in the world. It has been well said that "plunk" not "luck" is the reason why women succeed in the Institute work.

The minutes of the last district annual of Adolphustown were read by the secretary, Mrs. A. P. Young and approved by the meeting. The financial report showed a balance of $3.96 on hand for district funds and a total balance of $935.30 on hand among the Institutes of the district.

After discussion some matters not clearly understood were arranged satisfactorily.

It was moved by Mrs W. Cummings, seconded by Mrs. Phippen, that the summer series delegates' entertainment and transportation expenses be borne by the branches. Carried.

It was moved by Mrs. Hamm, seconded by Mrs. T. Craven, that the sum of 50c per member be paid by the branches to the district funds. Carried.

The reports from the eleven branch Institutes of the district were then given, namely: From Adolphustown, Bath, Bay View, Ernesttown, Conway, Maple Leaf, Napanee, Odessa, Violet, Wilton and Napanee Junior Institute.

These reports showed wonderful work accomplished by the branches during the year.

Many have included lecture papers, short courses, debates, mock trials dmonstrations, contests, music, current events, prizes for general proficiency in schools, school first aid kits, flowers and fruit for the sick, booths, banquets naming of streets, improvements on community halls, aiding and managing libraries, piecing quilts, layettes for worthy mothers, entertainment for church sheds, and last but unfortunate fire sufferers and baskets of Christmas cheer.

Adolphustown is the oldest branch in the district. Bath is the "baby" branch. Bay View is saying diligently to build a community hall. Violet showed work equal to the best of them and has been organized fifteen months. Already every available resident lady is a member of the Institute. The Napanee Junior branch has recently organized and is an out-growth of the four weeks' course for girls provided by the Department of Agriculture. They say: "They aim to devote their attention to social service work, since after careful consideration they deem it most worthy work.

A vocal duet was then given by Miss Babcock and Mrs. Reid of Wilton. Miss Helen Millman, of Maple Leaf gave a splendid reading.

Mr. Laughland was then asked to speak and did so with a few short words. He asked that each Institute try to arrange for a special meeting during July, when a representative from the Department of Agriculture would be in the district and give a poultry culling demonstration wherever possible. He encouraged each branch to hold a flower exhibit at a meeting during the latter part of August. He asked the support of the Institutes for the Chautauqua, which is going to visit Napanee again this summer. He very kindly offered to show moving pictures to the Institutes and to help in whatever way he could.

We were pleased to note in the reports that so many of the branches have availed themselves of Mr. Laughland's able services.

Mrs. Crowe, of Ernesttown, favoured the audience with a vocal solo. Mrs. T. Asselstine and daughter sang a duet. Miss Ruttan, who was sent by Adolphutown to the Guelph Girls' Conference, gave a report.

Mrs Shibley, provincial delegate, was the speaker of the day. She gave many points on Provincial Federation. She said:

"This Federation means a linking up, not for strength, but for service. Our efforts must not end in our own community. There are now Dominion and Imperial Federations and we feel proud to belong to a world wide institution. Seventeen delgates represent our Ontario Federation, one from each sub-division, chosen by the delegates from the districts, and they express the ideals of our Institutes. Such a question as maternal mortality would be remedied if such an organization as our federation took it up. Whereas the efforts of a single Institute here and there are not effective. The federation has helped materially in classifying the works of the standing committees by their co-operation with the Department.

"The study of health takes first place, and should be stressed by all branches. Home economics is helped by the short courses. Each branch should review the League of Nations' bulletins as an aid to education. Agriculture, Legislation, Immigration, Emigration Relief and Historical Research are worthy topics. Canadian Industry is also important and it is largely through the work of Institutes that there has been production of hydro power. Ontario asked the Institutes to censor the books for the libraries in their community. She showed a new Community Song Book now available."

Somehow, this address was very inspiring and lifted all above the small and petty problems of the work.

A solo was then given by Miss Sprouls of Odessa. A collection amounting to $11.03 was taken. Mrs. Phippen and Mrs. Day were appointed to audit the books.

Mrs. Shibley then took charge of the election of officers. The district very reluctantly accepted the resignation of the past president Mrs. Miller, who certainly been a mother to all the Institutes and as such shall she be missed.

The officers for the new year are as follows:

Hon. Pres.—Mrs. Miller.
President—Mrs. F. Hamm.
1st Vice-Pres.—Mrs. A. Wright.
2nd Vice-Pres.—Mrs. J. Laughland.
Sec'y Treas—Mrs. A. P. Young.
Federation Representative—Mrs. Ralph Ham.
Member of Executive to Kingston Convention—Mrs. Dr. Mabee.
Auditors—Mrs. Roblin and Mrs. Phippen.

The new president then took the chair and thanked them for electing her as such.

The meeting closed by singing the National Anthem.

The Odessa ladies served a delicious lunch of ice cream and cake to about 160.

Mrs. Snider, of Wilton, moved a hearty vote of thanks to Odessa ladies for their hospitality. This was seconded by Mrs. T. V. Anderson and heartily voiced by everyone.

An invitation from Maple Leaf Institute to entertain the District Annual Convention in June, 1929, was accepted.

SUNDAY SCHOOL LESSON

BY G. C. TRUMBULL,
(Editor of The Sunday School Times.)

THE EARLY LIFE OF SAUL.

Sunday, July 1.—Deuteronomy 6: 4-9 ; Phillipians 3: 4-6 ; Acts 22: 3, 27, 28.

Golden Text—Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth. (Eccles. 12:1)

The Lesson Committee has done wisely in commencing a six months' course in the Life and Letters of Paul, to assign the Scripture passages given for this lesson. It is a fresh and admirable way to begin the study of Paul's character and career. One way to treat the lesson in class would be to have the few verses indicated from each book, (Deuteronomy Phillipians, Acts) read aloud by three different members of the class, and then let the class volunteer all the biographical facts concerning Paul that these verses suggest.

They suggest, for example, three interesting combinations of qualities that are often supposed not to go together. Belief and brains go together; Paul had both. Culture and Christianity go together ; Paul had both. Patriotism and piety go together ; Paul had both. People often talk as though old-fashioned religious belief indicates ignorance, as though culture necessarily turns one away from real Christianity; as though a deply pious man could not be much of a patriot. Paul's experience refutes these mistaken notions.

His name ,at the beginning, was not Paul, but Saul. The six verses in Deuteronomy show how he was trained as a child. His family were strict monotheists: "Hear, O Israel: The Lord our God is one Lord." But monotheism does not mean Unitarianism, though etymologically the words may be similar. True Judaism and true Christianity have always been Trinitarian.

Let us remember that Deuteronomy is in the Pentateuch, one of the earliest parts of the Bible; yet this passage commands and expects Israel to love God with the whole heart, the whole out, and the whole might. Love as well as law is in the earliest Scriptures. Young Saul was brought up on that.

He was trained in Bible study. Israel's Scriptures, which are part of our Bible today, were to be taught diligently to their children, talked about when the family were together in their homes, and on the street, at the beginning of the day and the close of he day, and Scripture passages were written on the house posts and gate posts. Scripture mottoes for our walls are not a new thing, evidently. Saul was saturated with the inspired Word of God. He was a believer, indeed.

The Philippians passage shows in what strict religion he was brought up. His parents both believed and obeyed the law of God. He says he was "an Hebrew of the Hebrews." And he was of the party of Pharisees, who were the fundamentalists of their day. His father was a Pharisee before him (Acts 23:6). Pharisee is from a Hebrew word meaning "separate." The sect had "degenerated into a letter-strictness which overlaid the law with traditional interpretations held to have been communicated by Jehovah to Moses as oral explanations of equal authority with the law itself." The Pharisees had become self-righteous, without any sense of sin and need Saul was later awakened to this tragic spiritual condition of his own life. He was "blameless" so far as the law was concerned, and very zealous, but in God's sight spiritually dead.

In the passage in Acts he tells us that he was born in Tarsus, and brought up in Jerusalem at the feet of Gamaliel. We know that Tarsus was celebrated as a school of Greek literature and philosophy ; it was even ranked by Strabo above Athens and Alexandria in such scholarship. So Paul ranked as a university graduate would today ; in Tarsus he had received providentially that training which adapted him for dealing with the polished Greeks on their own ground, quoting Aratus, a Cilician poet ; Epimenides, a Cretan ; and Menander, Athenian comedian,"

But he knew how to use his hands as well as his head, for he learned the Cilician trade of making tents of goat-hair cloth. (Acts 18 : 3).

Gamaliel, under whom young Saul had studied the Hebrew law, was a famous Pharisee whose good sense was shown in his advice to the Jewish Council to let the apostles alone (Acts 5:34). Gamaliel was even called by the Jews "the glory of the law," and he was president of the Sanhedrin under three different Roman emperors.

When Paul, therefore, was called to account later by zealous Pharisees he could say truthfully that he knew all about their good zeal and sympatized with them. It was sincere zeal, but terribly mistaken, for it consisted of the Church of Christ (Phil. 3:6 ; Acts 22:3).

Paul was proud of his nativity and Roman citizenship. He related how he defended the chief captain of the Roman soldiers and centurions who rescued him from the mob that he was "a man which am a Jew of Tarsus, a city in Cilicia, a citizen of no mean city". (Acts 21:39). When the officer told Paul he had obtained his own freedom as a Roman "with a great sum having was free born" (Acts 22:28). Although purchased it, Paul replied, "But I another time in Philippi, when the magistrates had had Paul and Silas beaten and imprisoned and later sent word to let the prisoner go, Paul sent word back reminding the magistrates that they had beaten and imprisoned a Roman citizen without a trial, and he added ; "Nay verily ; but let them come themselves and fetch us out." In fear and trembling the magistrates met this demand of a Roman citizen, went personally to the prison, released the prisoners themselves, and pleaded with them to leave the city in peace.

This was an extraordinary man whose life story we have just commenced to study. He had such a heritage and training as few men have. But he tells us later that he counted it all but loss and refuse if only he might win Christ.

CANADIAN CANNERS CONTINUE SCHOLARSHIP FOR STUDY OF PRODUCTION OF CANNING CROPS

SUMMARY OF RESULTS OF THE FIRST THREE YEARS STUDY.

Early in the spring of 1925 the Canadian Canners Limited granted the Department of Chemistry, of the Ontario Agricultural College $1000 a year for three years for experimental work with fertilizers. The donors had noticed the gradual decrease in crop yields, especially in Norfolk Co. and expressed themselves as anxious to know to what extent the yield and quality of canning crops could be influenced by the use of fertilizers, and, also, to what extent, the residue of the fertilizer would affect succeeding crops.

As the Department of Chemistry had permanent plots in Norfolk Co., which naturally formed a nucleus for further work, the greater part of the work has been done in that district. The crops experimented with were tomatoes, peas and corn. Potatoes, although not a canning crop, were also included.

Naturally three years experiments do not furnish enough data on which to base positive statements. It has been found that practically all our soils are deficient in available phosphoric acid and that in very many instances prosphoric acid is the limiting factor in plant growth. Not only does it increase the yield of the crop for which it is applied but where wheat followed peas, the yield of the wheat was increased forty-five per cent. Consequently, we are of the opinion that the percentage of phosphoric acid should be high in all fertilizer mixtures and that 40 to twelve per cent is not too much for practically all soil types and all crops

The question of potash requirements within the fertilizer will vary with the soil type, its fertility and kind of crop grown. It appears to be very definite that the tomato plant responds to potash. On light, sandy soils and low in humus, from four to six per cent is beneficial, but on heavier soils from two to four per cent is sufficient. Peas also respond to potash. The amount varying from two to four per cent on heavy soils to six and possibly eight per cent on light sandy soils.

Much more extensive work throughout the Province has been done with potatoes. It has been found that from two to four per cent more potash within the mixture than recommended for the tomato crop will be very profitable.

Results obtained from the corn experiments do not give very positive data at present, but it is evident that both potash and phosphorus are essential.

Acid soils are a question is perhaps the most important of all, as it is the hardest to control, the most expensive to purchase, and if applied too large quantities will do more harm than good. The plant requirements will depend upon the kind of crop, the fertility and physical state of the soil and the possible weather conditions—if cold and wet more will be required. In general, the less or the fertility of the soil, the more nitrogen is needed However, if the grower has turned under a well manured clover sod or extra heavy application of manure, in preparation for any crop, it is advisable to reduce the percentage of nitrogen or eliminate it altogether, thereby reducing the cost of production and upsetting the balance of plant food.

This spring the Canadian Canners decided to continue the grant of more than another three years The object being to concentrate more on the improvement of the yield and quality of the tomato crop. Accordingly experiments which include a study of the yield and quality of tomatoes, as influenced by plant nutrients, have been started in the neighborhood of Port Burwell, Simcoe, Dunnville, Niagara-on-the-Lake, Virgil and Brighton. We are also continuing some of the work of the previous years on which further data is necessary.

A ROOSTER DAY

Poultry raisers who build up a trade in strictly fresh eggs, known by the name of "specials" see to it that the male birds do not run with the yock. Not only do they consume a certain amount of expensive food, but fertilized eggs do not keep nearly as well as those that are sterile. Indeed after warm weather arrives the male birds should be done away with, except, of course, in flocks of the breeders of pure bred fowl who produce stock and eggs for breeding purposes. The uselessness of the male in the laying flock is being recognized in many quarters and a prominent newspaper in Eastern Ontario, the Renfrew "Mercury" has made a novel suggestion that a "Rooster Day" be organized. The Editor, in urging this, points out that the keeping of male birds throughout the year is an economic loss which in the aggregate means a waste of thousands of dollars yearly in every township. The cost of maintenance of such birds is about $3 per year each. Only those whow ant eggs from their own premises for hatching, it is pointed out, have any need of male birds, and as the time is arriving when poultry raisers are adopting the practice of renewing their flocks by the purchase of baby chicks, there is no reason whatever for keeping over the male birds. A Rooster Day, it is believed would in a very real sense be a "booster day" for the poultry industry, which is steadily gaining in importance A leaflet of the Department of Agriculture at Ottawa recommends he killing off of the male birds after the breeding season and sets the first of June as the time when roosters should be sent to market, because after that date, it is pointed out, millions of dollars are lost through the presence of partially incubated eggs in the produce which is marketed.

Legs of the Great.

America is interested in the conclusions of Dr. Joseph L. Ineriand, president of the Podiatrists' Research Association, who estimates that one woman in every ten and one man in every twenty-five have bow legs. He finds that the extra development of the leg muscles helps to retain the entire muscular contour of the body.

Many famous contemporary men are put in the bow-leg class by Dr. Interland, including Mussolini, Charlie Chaplin, ex-Kaiser Wilhelm, Babe Ruth, the champion American baseball player, and Will Rogers, the cowboy humorist.

Among the bow legs of the past were Julius Cæsar, William the Conqueror, George Washington, and Theodore Roosevelt. Dr. Interland has a similar list of bow-legged women, but he gallantly refuses to make it public.

CARE OF CHICKS ON RANGE

(Experimental Farms Note)

The simpler the methods of feeding and caring for the chicks that can be adopted the better.

Feeding tests at the Central Experimental Farm have shown equally as good results from hopper feeding as when the chicks were fed at regular intervals, five or six times a day. When the nursery period is past and the chicks old enough to go without heat they should be given roosts and as soon as they become used to them should be put out on range.

For range a light, sandy soil is best. If a field of alfalfa is available on the one hand and a corn field on the other, the conditions are ideal,

Do not overcrowd ; use airy, well ventilated houses, a mere shelter—roof and walls covered with wire netting we have found excellent.

Shift the houses and feed hoppers frequently so that the ground where the chicks spend most of their time does not become cotaminated.

Keep a supply of pure water, hoppers of growing mash, crimped oats, grit and oyster shell before the flock at all times. Give a full feed of grain in the evening ; this is fed either by hand or kept in hoppers which can be opened for a while in the evening and closed through the day.

Chickens kept as described will be reared under ideal conditions with the minimum amount of labour.

Half a million automobiles from the United States and the provinces of Canada, carrying a million and a half persons, will enter Montreal during the coming tourist season, according to the estimate of the Montreal Tourist and Convention Bureau.

The use of the combine is expected to be more general than ever in the 1928 harvest. In 1926 there were 176 combines in the Prairie Provinces, 148 being in Saskatchewan, 26 in Alberta and 2 in Manitoba. In 1927 there was a total of 530 in Saskatchewan, 221 in Alberta and 23 in Manitoba 774 in all.

There is considerable tree planting activity along the Medicine Hat division of the Canadian Pacific Railway. At Shackleton alone twenty-five bundles of small trees were received the other day from the Forestry Branch at Indian Head, Saskatchewan, and all are now planted. Cluny and other villages are competing actively.

Equaling the speed across the Atlantic records made by passenger liners of medium size, the five 10,000 ton vessels of the "Beaver" class have been achieving records in oceanic freight transportation for the Canadian Pacific Steamships. The speedy quintette of freighters joined the company's fleet this year and have been running on as frequent and rapid a service between Canada and Europe as many passenger boats.

Chicago.—"Smiling Billy Hogan," veteran C.P.R. conductor, took "The Mountaineer," Canadian Pacific flyer from Chicago to Vancouver on its initial run of the season this year. The train is one of the "Big Five"—C.P.R. trains de Lux operating from Chicago and the east of Canada across the continent during the summer. Conductor Hogan joined the "Soo" line in 1886 as a boiler on the old Wisconsin Railway, and is to-day one of the veterans of the company.

Montreal.—A new era in Canadian trans-Atlantic passenger history, has been inaugurated in Montreal where the new liner "Duchess of Bedford" docked recently. The new 20,000 ton vessel, the largest to ascend the St. Lawrence to Montreal, is the first of four cabin class sister ships of the new "Duchess" type, which will supplement the Canadian Pacific's trans-Atlantic and winter cruise services. Speakers at the banquet held on board on arrival in Montreal attended her maiden voyage adjoined the occasion as an event of national significance.

The Feast of St. John the Baptist, greatest of French Canadian religious spectacles, will be celebrated throughout the province of Quebec shortly. The Montreal baseball stadium, which will accommodate 25,000 persons, will be crowded by spectators of a French Canadian oratorio, to be followed by a spectacular fireworks display. On the latter night thirty floats, depicting French Canadian songs, many bands, and over 10,000 singers will participate. All will come together in a procession several miles long through the streets of Montreal

A THOUSAND-POUND NOTE.

Enabled Man to Make Purchases and Get Credit Without a Deposit.

"Mr. Edward Tyrrel Smith, with whom I had business relations for some three or four years was," writes Mr. Mapleson in his "Memoirs," "an extraordinary personage whose like could be met with only in our own time and in such capitals as London or Paris, where the population in general has certainly not the faintest idea how some small part of that population lives.

"Mr. Smith had made up his mind early in life to be the possessor, or at least the handler, of considerable sums of money; and he at one time found it worth his while, so as never to be without funds, to hire daily, at the rate of one pound per day, a thousand-pound note, which was obligingly entrusted to him by a moneylender of the period, one Sam Genese.

"There are not many persons to whom such a loan would be worth the thirty-six-and-a-half per cent. interest which Mr. Smith paid for it. He was an adept, however, at all kinds of business, and his thousand-pound note enabled him to make purchases on credit which without deposit money he would have been unable to effect. Attending sales, he would buy whatever happened to suit him, with a view to immediate re-sale, offering his thousand-pound note as a deposit, to discover as a matter of course that it could not be changed, and have the article for which he had bid marked down to him all the same. Then he would re-sell, and pocket the difference."

BY MARY J. HOLMES

Author of "Dora Deane," "The English Orphans," "Lena Rivers," "The Rector of St. Mark's," "Tempest and Sunshine," Etc.

"Disgraced for ever and ever," she kept repeating to herself, as she tried to shake off the horrid nightmare stealing over her. "How can I hold up my head again at home where nobody will understand just how it was—nobody but grandpa and grandma? Oh, grandpa, I can't earn that thirty-six dollars now. I most wish I was dead, and I am dying. Somebody—come—quick!"

There was a heavy fall, and while in Mrs. Conner's parlor Guy Remington and Dr. Holbrook were chatting gayly with Agnes, a childish figure was lying upon the office floor, white, stiff, and insensible.

Little Jessie Remington, tired of sitting still and listening to what her mamma and Mrs. Conner were saying, had strayed off into the garden, and after filling her chubby hands with daffodils and early violets, wended her way to the office, the door of which was partially ajar. Peering curiously in, she saw the crumpled bonnet, with its ribbons of blue, and, attracted by this, advanced into the room, until she came where Madeline was lying. With a feeling that something was wrong, Jessie sent over the prostrate girl, asking if she was asleep, and lifting next the long, fringed lashes drooping over the motionless cheek. The dull, dead expression of the eyes sent a chill through Jessie's frame, and hurrying to the house she cried: "Oh, Brother Guy, somebody's dead in the office, and her bonnet is all jammed!"

Scarcely were the words uttered ere Guy and the doctor both were with Madeline, the former holding her tenderly in his arms, while he smoothed the short hair, thinking even then how soft and luxuriant it was, and how fair was the face which never moved a muscle beneath his scrutiny. The doctor was wholly self-possessed. Maddy had no terrors for him now. He needed his services, and he rendered them willingly, applying restoratives which soon brought back signs of life in the rigid form. With a shiver and a moan Madeline whispered: "Oh, grandma, I'm so tired," and nestled closer to the bosom where she had never dreamed of lying.

By this time both Mrs. Conner and Agnes had come out, asking in much surprise who the stranger could be, and what was the cause of her illness. As if there had been a previous understanding between them the doctor and Guy were silent with regard to the event. Madeline was there, simply saying it was possible she was in the habit of fainting, many people were. Very daintily Agnes held up and back the skirt of her rich silk, as if fearful it might come in contact with Madeline's plain delaine; then, as it was evident interesting for her to stand and see the doctor "make so much fuss over a young girl," as she mentally expressed it, she returned to the neglected bidding Jessie do the same. But Jessie chose to stay by Maddy, whom they placed upon the sofa-like lounge, which she preferred to being taken to the house, as Guy proposed.

"I'm better now, much better," she said. "If you please, I'd rather be alone."

So they left her, all but Jessie, who, fascinated by the sweet young face, climbed upon the lounge and, laying her curly head caressingly against Madeline's arm, said to her: "Poor girl, you're sick, and I'm so sorry. What makes you sick?"

There was genuine sympathy in that little voice, and it opened the pent-up flood before so furiously that Mrs. Maddy's heart. With a cry as of sudden pain she clasped the child in her arms and wept out a wild, passionate fit of weeping which did her so much good. Forgetting that Jessie could not understand, and feeling it a relief to tell her grief to someone, she said, in reply to Jessie's oft-repeated inquiries as to what was the matter: "I did not get a certificate, and I wanted it so much, for we are poor, and our house is mortgaged, and I was going to help grandpa pay it."

"It's dreadful to be poor," sighed little Jessie, as her waxen fingers threaded the soft, nut-brown hair resting in her lap, where Maddy had laid her aching head.

Maddy did not know who this beautiful child was, but her sympathy was very sweet, and they talked together as children will, until Mrs. Agnes' voice was heard calling to her little girl that it was time to go.

"I love you, Maddy, and I mean to tell brother about it," Jessie said, as she wound her arms around the girl's neck and kissed her at parting.

It never occurred to Maddy to ask her name, so stupefied she felt, and with a responsive kiss she sent her away. Leaning her head upon the table, she forgot all but her own wretchedness, and so did not see the gayly dressed, haughty-looking lady who swept past the door, accompanied by Guy and Dr. Holbrook. Neither did she hear a noticing, as the subdued hum of their voices as they talked together, for a moment. Agnes asking the doctor very pretty to come up to Aikenside while she was there, and bring his lady-love. Engaged young men like Guy were so stupid, she said, as with a merry laugh she sprang into the carriage; and, bowing gracefully to the doctor, was driven rapidly toward Aikenside.

Rather slowly the doctor resumed to the office, and after fidgeting for a time among the powders and phials, summoned courage to ask Madeline how she felt, and if any of the fainting symptoms had returned.

"No, sir," was all the reply she gave him, never lifting up her head, or even thinking which of the two young men it was speaking to her.

There was a call just then for Dr. Holbrook, and leaving his office in charge of Tom, his shore boy, he went away, feeling slightly uneomfortable whenever he thought of the girl to whom he felt that justice had not been done.

"I half wish I had examined her myself," he said. "Of course she was excited, and could not answer; besides, hanged if I don't believe it was all humbug tormenting her with Greek and Latin. Yes; I'll question her when I get back, and if she'll possibly pass, give her the certificate. Poor child, how white she was, and what a queer look there was in those great eyes, when she said, 'I shall not take it.'"

Never in his life before had Dr. Holbrook been as much interested in any female who was sick as he was in Madeline, and determining to make his call on Mrs. Briggs as brief as possible, he alighted at her gate, and knocked impatiently at her door. He found her pretty sick, while both her children needed a prescription and so long a time was he detained that his heart misgave him on his homeward route, lest Maddy should be gone, and with her the chance to remedy the wrong he might have done her.

Maddy was gone, and the wheel ruts of the square-boxed wagon were fresh before the door when he came back. Grandma Markham had returned, and Madeline, who recognized old Sorrel's step, had gathered her shawl around her and gone softly out to meet him. One look at her face was sufficient.

"You failed, Maddy?" the old man said, fixing about her feet the warm buffalo robe for the night wind was blowing cold.

"Yes, grandpa, I failed."

They were out of the village and more than a mile on their way home before Madeline found voice to say so much, and they were nearer home by half a mile ere the old man answered back:

"And, Maddy, I failed too."

CHAPTER IV.

Mrs. Noah, the housekeeper at Aikenside, was slicing vegetable oysters for the nice little dish intended for her own supper, when the head of Sorrel came around the corner of the building, followed by the square-boxed wagon containing Grandpa Markham, who, bewildered by the beauty and spaciousness of the grounds, and wholly uncertain as to where he ought to stop, had driven over the smooth-graveled road around to the front kitchen door. Mrs. Noah's spacious domain, as sacred as Betsey Trotwood's patch of green.

"In the name of wonder, what codger is that? and what is he doing here?" was Mrs. Noah's exclamation, as she dropped the bit of salsify she was scraping, and hurrying to the door, called out: "I say, you, sir, what made you drive up here, when I've said over and over again that I couldn't have wheels tearing up the gravel?"

"I beg your pardon, I lost my way, I guess, there are so many turn in's. I'm sorry, but a little rain will fetch it right," grandpa said, glancing ruefully at the ruts in the gravel and the marks on the turf.

Mrs. Noah was not at heart an unkind woman, and something in the benignant expression of Grandpa's face, or in the apologetic tone of his voice, mollified her somewhat, and without further comment she stood waiting for his next remark. It was a most unfortunate one, for though as free from rudeness as most of her sex, Mrs. Noah was decidedly sensitive as to her age, and the same ensuslaker would never venture twice within her precincts dressed in her dress, which was this leisure after noon much smarter than usual, grandpa considered she could not be a servant, and as she seemed to have a right to say where he should drive and where he should not, the meek old man concluded she was a near relation of Guy—mother, perhaps; but no, Guy's mother was dead, as grandpa well knew, for all Devonshire had heard of the young bride Agnes, who had married Guy's father for money and rank. To have been mistaken for Guy's mother would not have offended Mrs. Noah particularly; but how was she when she heard

"I come on business with Squire Guy. Are you his wife, marm?"

"His gran'marm!" and Mrs. Noah bit off the last syllable spitefully. "Bless you, man, Squire Guy, as you call him, is twenty-five years old."

As Grandpa Markham was rather blind, he failed to see the point, but knew that in some way he had given offense.

"I beg your pardon, ma'am; I was sure you was some kin—maybe an a'nt."

No, she was not even that; but willing enough to let the old man believe her a lady of the Remington order, she did not explain that she was simply the housekeeper; she simply said:

"If it's Mr Guy you want, I can tell you he is not at home, which will save your getting out."

"Not at home, and I've come so far to see him!" grandpa exclaimed, and in his voice there was so much genuine disappointment that Mrs. Noah rejoined, quite kindly:

"He's gone over to Devonshire with the young lady, his stepmother. Perhaps you might tell me your business; I know all Mr. Guy's affairs."

"If I might come in, ma'am," he answered, meekly, as through the open door he caught glimpses of a cheerful fire. "It's mighty chilly for such as me."

He did look cold and blue, Mrs. Noah thought, and she bade him come in, feeling a very little contempt for the old-fashioned camlet cloak in which his feet became entangled, and smiling inwardly at the shrunken, faded pantaleons, betokening poverty.

"As you know all Squire Guy's affairs," grandpa said, when he was seated before the fire, "maybe you could tell whether he would be likely to lend a stranger three hundred dollars—not that stranger I am."

Mrs. Noah stared at him aghast. Was he crazy, or did he mean to insult her master? Evidently neither. He seemed as sane as herself, while no one could associate an insult with him. He did not know anything. That was the solution of his audacity, and pityingly, as she would have addressed a half-idiot, Mrs. Noah made him understand how impossible it was for him to think her master would lend to a stranger like him.

"You say he's gone to Devonshire," grandpa said, softly, with a quiver on his lip when she had finished. "I wish I'd knew it; I left my grandd'ter there to be examined. Mebby I'll meet him going back, and can ask him."

"I tell you it won't be no use. Mr. Guy has only seven hundred dollars to throw away," was Mrs. Noah's rather sharp rejoinder.

"Well, well, we won't quarrel about it," the old man replied, in his most conciliatory manner, as he turned his head away to hide the starting tear. Grandchild's darkhaus's heart was very sore, and Mrs. Noah's harshness troubled him. He could not bear to think that Guy really was cross with him, besides that he wanted something to carry Maddy besides disappointment, so by way of testing Mrs. Noah's amiability and pleasing Maddy, too, he said, as he arose: "I'm an old man, lady, old enough to be your father." Here Mrs. Noah's face grew brighter, and she listened attentively while he continued: "You won't take what I say amiss, I'm sure, for I've a little girl at home, a grandchild, who he heard big stories of the fine things at Aikenside. She has a hankerin' after such vanities, and it would please her mightily to have me tell her what I saw up here, so maybe you wouldn't mind lettin' me go into that big room where the silk fixin's are, I'll take off my shoes, if you say so."

"Your shoes won't hurt an atom; come right along," Mrs. Noah replied, now in the best of moods, for, except her cup of green tea with raspberry jam and cream, she enjoyed nothing more than showing their handsome house.

Conducting him through the wide, marbled hall, she ushered him into the drawing-room, where for a time he stood perfectly bewildered. It was his first introduction to rosewood, velvet, and brocatelle, and it seemed to him as if he had suddenly been transported to fairyland.

"Maddy would like this—its her nature," he whispered, advancing a step or two, and setting down his feet as softly as if stepping on eggs.

Happening to lift his eyes before one of the long mirrors, he spied himself, wondering much what that "queer-looking chap" was doing there in the midst of so much elegance, and why Mrs. Noah did not turn him out of doors. Evidently she was waiting for this flash of pride, and determined to make amends, he bowed low to the figure in the glass, which bowed as low in return, but did not reply to the very "good-natured remark," "How d'ye do—pretty well, to-day?"

"There was a familiar look about the round cape of the camlet cloak, and Grandpa Markham's face turned crimson as the truth burst upon him.

"How could of me Maddy would be," he thought, glancing sidewise at Mrs. Noah, who had withdrawn discreetly, and was now looking from the window at the garden walks.

Grandpa believed she did not see him, and comforted with that assurance, he began to remark upon the mirror, saying to himself it never see if there was two of you, a remark which Mrs. Noah fully appreciated. He saw the silk dress, slyly touching one to see if it did feel like the forget-me-not chasdoun dress worn by his wife forty-two years ago that very spring. Then he fairly trembled as he examined the rare ornaments, and came nearer bowing again to the portrait of the first Mrs. Remington, who, as he had married Guy's father for money and rank. To have been mistaken for Guy's mother would not have offended Mrs. Noah particularly; but how was she when she heard

"I come on business with Squire Guy. Are you his gran'marm?"

"His gran'marm!" and Mrs. Noah bit off the last syllable spitefully. "Bless you, man, Squire Guy, as you call him, is twenty-five years old."

As Grandpa Markham was rather blind, he failed to see the point, but knew that in some way he had given offense.

"I beg your pardon, ma'am; I was sure you was some kin—maybe an a'nt."

No, she was not even that; but willing enough to let the old man believe her a lady of the Remington order, she did not explain that she was simply the housekeeper; she simply said:

"If it's Mr Guy you want, I can tell you he is not at home, which will save your getting out."

"Not at home, and I've come so far to see him!" grandpa exclaimed, and in his voice there was so much genuine disappointment that Mrs. Noah rejoined, quite kindly:

"He's gone over to Devonshire with the young lady, his stepmother. Perhaps you might tell me your business; I know all Mr. Guy's affairs."

"If I might come in, ma'am," he answered, meekly, as through the open door he caught glimpses of a cheerful fire. "It's mighty chilly for such as me."

He did look cold and blue, Mrs. Noah thought, and she bade him come in, feeling a very little contempt for the old-fashioned camlet cloak in which his feet became entangled, and smiling inwardly at the shrunken, faded pantaleons, betokening poverty.

"As you know all Squire Guy's affairs," grandpa said, when he was seated before the fire, "maybe you could tell whether he would be likely to lend a stranger three hundred dollars—not that stranger I am."

Mrs. Noah stared at him aghast. Was he crazy, or did he mean to insult her master? Evidently neither. He seemed as sane as herself, while no one could associate an insult with him. He did not know anything. That was the solution of his audacity, and pityingly, as she would have addressed a half-idiot, Mrs. Noah made him understand how impossible it was for him to think her master would lend to a stranger like him.

"You say he's gone to Devonshire," grandpa said, softly, with a quiver on his lip when she had finished. "I wish I'd knew it; I left my grandd'ter there to be examined. Mebby I'll meet him going back, and can ask him."

"I tell you it won't be no use. Mr. Guy has only seven hundred dollars to throw away," was Mrs. Noah's rather sharp rejoinder.

"Well, well, we won't quarrel about it," the old man replied, in his most conciliatory manner, as he turned his head away to hide the starting tear. Grandchild's darkhaus's heart was very sore, and Mrs. Noah's harshness troubled him. He could not bear to think that Guy really was cross with him, besides that he wanted something to carry Maddy besides disappointment, so by way of testing Mrs. Noah's amiability and pleasing Maddy, too, he said, as he arose: "I'm an old man, lady, old enough to be your father." Here Mrs. Noah's face grew brighter, and she listened attentively while he continued: "You won't take what I say amiss, I'm sure, for I've a little girl at home, a grandchild, who he heard big stories of the fine things at Aikenside. She has a hankerin' after such vanities, and it would please her mightily to have me tell her what I saw up here, so maybe you wouldn't mind lettin' me go into that big room where the silk fixin's are, I'll take off my shoes, if you say so."

"Your shoes won't hurt an atom; come right along," Mrs. Noah replied, now in the best of moods, for, except her cup of green tea with raspberry jam and cream, she enjoyed nothing more than showing their handsome house.

Conducting him through the wide, marbled hall, she ushered him into the drawing-room, where for a time he stood perfectly bewildered. It was his first introduction to rosewood, velvet, and brocatelle, and it seemed to him as if he had suddenly been transported to fairyland.

"Maddy would like this—its her nature," he whispered, advancing a step or two, and setting down his feet as softly as if stepping on eggs.

Happening to lift his eyes before one of the long mirrors, he spied himself, wondering much what that "queer-looking chap" was doing there in the midst of so much elegance, and why Mrs. Noah did not turn him out of doors. Evidently she was waiting for this flash of pride, and determined to make amends, he bowed low to the figure in the glass, which bowed as low in return, but did not reply to the very "good-natured remark," "How d'ye do—pretty well, to-day?"

"There was a familiar look about the round cape of the camlet cloak, and Grandpa Markham's face turned crimson as the truth burst upon him.

"How could of me Maddy would be," he thought, glancing sidewise at Mrs. Noah, who had withdrawn discreetly, and was now looking from the window at the garden walks.

Grandpa believed she did not see him, and comforted with that assurance, he began to remark upon the mirror, saying to himself it never see if there was two of you, a remark which Mrs. Noah fully appreciated. He saw the silk dress, slyly touching one to see if it did feel like the forget-me-not chasdoun dress worn by his wife forty-two years ago that very spring. Then he fairly trembled as he examined the rare ornaments, and came nearer bowing again to the portrait of the first Mrs. Remington, who, as he had married Guy's father for money and rank. To have been mistaken for Guy's mother would not have offended Mrs. Noah particularly; but how was she when she heard

"This will last Maddy a week. I thank you, ma'am." Then he added some consideration to the happiness of a young girl, who wouldn't disgrace even such a room as this," he said, as he passed into the hall.

Mrs. Noah received his thanks graciously, and led him to the yard, where Sorrel was awaiting for him.

"Odd, but clever as the day is long," was Mrs. Noah's comment, as after seeing him safe out of her yard she went back to her vegetable oysters boiling on the stove.

Driving at a brisk trot through the grounds, Sorrel was soon upon the highway; and with spirits exhilarated by thoughts of going home, he kept up the trot until, turning a sudden corner, he came near running the carriage from Aikenside approaching at a rapid rate. The driver, Paul, saw him too, but seeming to give half the road to such as Sorrel and the square-boxed wagon, he kept steadily on, while Grandpa Markham, determined to speak to Guy, reined his horse a little nearer, raising his hand in token that the negro should stop. As a natural consequence, the wheels of the two vehicles became interlocked, and as the powerful grays were more than a match for Sorrel, the front wheel of Grandpa Markham's wagon was wrenched off, and the old man precipitated to the ground; which, fortunately for him, was in that locality covered with sand banks, so that he was only stunned for an instant, and thus failed to hear the insolent negro's remark: "Served you right, old cove; might of turned out for gentlemen." Neither did he see the sudden flashing of Guy Remington's eye, as, leaping from his carriage, he seized the astonished African by the collar, and, hurling him from the box, demanded what he meant by serving an old man so shameful a trick and then insulting him.

All apology and regret, the cringing driver tried to make some excuse, but Guy stopped him short, telling him to see how much the wagon was damaged, while he ran to the old man, who had recovered from the first shock and was trying to extricate himself from the folds of his camlet cloak. Nearby was a blacksmith's shop, toward which Guy ordered his driver to take the broken-down wagon with a view to getting it repaired.

"Tell him I want it done at once," he said, authoritatively, as if he well knew his name carried weight with it; then, turning to grandpa, he asked again if he were hurt.

"No, not specially—jolted my old bones some. You are very kind," grandpa replied, brushing the dust from his pantaloons and then involuntarily grasping Guy's arm for support, as his weak illness began to trouble him from the effects of excitement and fright.

"That darky shall rue this job," Guy said, savagely, as he gazed pityingly upon the shaky old creature beside him. "I'll discharge him to-morrow."

"No, young man. Don't be rash. He'll never do't again; and sprigs like him think they've a right to make fun of old codgers like me," was grandpa's meek expostulation.

"Do, pray, Guy, how long must we wait here?" Agnes asked, impatiently, leaning back in the carriage and partially drawing her veil over her face as she joined in Grandpa Markham, but a look from Guy silenced her; and turning again to grandpa, he asked:

"What did you say? You have been to Aikenside to see me?"

"Yes, and I was sorry to miss you [illegible] makes me feel awkward to tell you, but I wanted to borrow some money, and I didn't know nobody as likely to have it as you. That woman up to your house said she knowed you wouldn't let me have it, 'cause you hadn't it to spare. Mebby you haven't," and grandpa waited anxiously for Guy's reply.

Now, Mrs. Noah had a singular influence over her young master, who was in the habit of consulting her with regard to his affairs, and nothing could have been more unpropitious to the success of grandpa's suit than the knowing she disapproved. Beside this, Guy had only the previous week lost a small amount loaned under similar circumstances. Standing silent for a moment, while he buried and reburied his shining patent leather boots in the hills of sand, he said at last: "Candidly, sir, I don't believe I can accommodate you. I am about to make improvements at Aikenside that partially promised to loan money on good security to a Mr. Silas Slocum, who, 'if things work right,' as he expressed it, intends building a mill on some property which has come, or is coming, into his hands."

"That's mine—that's mine, my homestead," gasped grandpa, turning white almost as his hair blowing in the April wind. "There's a stream of water, and he says it'll be forever closes and gets it he shall build a mill, and tear our old house down."

Guy grew pale as he said: "I never asked how much—Mr. Markham wanted, and as the latter had not told him, he naturally concluded it a much larger amount. It really was, and did not care just then to lend it.

"I'll tell you what I'll do," he said, after a little. "I'll drop Slocum a note to-night saying I've changed my mind, and shall not let him have the money. Perhaps, then, he won't be so anxious to build a mill. I'll give you time to look among your friends."

Guy laid a little emphasis on that last word, and looking up quickly, grandpa was about to say: "I'm not so much a stranger as you think. I knew your father well," but he checked himself with the thought: "No, that will be too much like begging pay for a deed of mercy done years ago." So Guy never suspected that the old man before him had once laid his sire under a debt of gratitude. The more he reflected upon the transaction, the more he felt for and found the rapid pulse.

"If she would awaken," he said, laying the hand softly down and placing it upon the throbbing forehead, where the great sweat-drops lay.

And, after a time, Maddy did awaken, and for a moment, so intently on him, there was no look of recognition, and the doctor was half glad that it was so. He did not wish her to associate him with the fearful nightmare she had been in, but would rather she should think of him as someone come to cure her, for cure her he intended to himself. Then he gazed into her childish face, and thought how sad it was for such as she to die. When first he offered to take charge of her heart struck with the extreme plainness of the furniture, betokening that wealth had not rewarded Maddy's labors, but now he forgot everything except the sick girl, who grew more and more restless, talking of him and the Latin verb "amo," and "I love," she said, and which was not in the grammar.

"Guy was a fool and I was a brute," the doctor muttered, as he folded up the bits of paper whose contents he hoped might do much toward saving Maddy's life.

Then promising to come again, he rode rapidly away, to visit other patients, who, that afternoon, were in danger of being sadly neglected, as constantly was their young physician's mind dwelling upon the little low-walled chamber where Maddy lay, while he thought eleven o'clock she knew them all, and heard that Dr. Holbrook had been there prescribing for her. Turning her face to the wall, she seemed to be thinking; then, calling her grandmother to her, she whispered: "Did he smooth my hair back and say, 'poor child'?"

Her grandmother hardly thought he did, though she was not in the room all the time, she said: "He had stayed a long while and was greatly interested."

Maddy had a vague remembrance of such an incident, and in her heart forgave the doctor for his rejection, thinking only how handsome he had looked, even while tormenting her with such unheard of questions, and how kind he was to her now. The sight of her grandfather awakened a new train of ideas, and bidding him to sit beside her, she asked if their home must be sold. Maddy was not to be put off with an evasion, and so grandpa told her honestly at last that Slocum would foreclose, but not while she was sick; he had been seen that day by Mr Green, and had promised so much forbearance.

This was the last rational conversation held with Maddy for many a week, and when next morning the doctor came, there was a look of deep anxiety upon his face as he watched the alarming symptoms of this delirious patient, who talked incessantly, not of the examination now, but of the mortgage and the foreclosure, begging the doctor to see that the house was not sold, to tell them she was earning thirty-six dollars by teaching school, that Beauty would be sold to save their dear old home. All this was strange at first to the doctor, but the rather voluble Mrs. Green, who had come to Grandma Markham's relief, enlightened him, dwelling with a kind of malicious pleasure upon the fact that Maddy's earnings, had she been permitted to get a "stifficut," were to be appropriated toward paying the debt.

If the doctor had hated himself the previous day when he rode from the red cottage gate, he hated himself doubly now as he went dashing down the road, determined to resign his office of county inspector that very day. And he did.

Summoning around him those who had been most active in electing him, he refused to officiate again, assuring them that if any more candidates came he should either turn them from his door or give them a certificate without asking a question.

"Put anybody you like in my place," he said; "anybody but Guy Remington. Don't for thunder's sake take him."

There was no probability of this, as Guy lived in another town, and could not have officiated had he been. But the doctor was too much excited to reason upon anything save Madeline Clyde's case. That he perfectly understood, and during the next few weeks his other patients waited many times in vain for his coming, while he sat by Maddy's side watching every change, whether for the worse or better. Even Agnes Remiffton was totally neglected, so one day she sent Guy down to Devonshire to say that as Jessie seemed more than usually delicate, she wished the doctor to take her under his charge and visit her at least once a week. The doctor was not at home but Tom, and he expected him every moment, seating himself in the armchair. Guy waited until he came.

New Memorial Planned.

Although Mexico City is already filled with monuments dedicated to Francisco Madero and other revolutionary heroes, still another memorial may decide, erected to commemorate the revolution of 1910. It will be entitled "Sons of the Revolution" and will probably be placed in the Plaza de Constitucion, the large square on the sides of which face the great national cathedral and the national palace.

Forests In Britain.

There are now sixty-two forests in England and Wales and fifty in Scotland, although the trees in many of them may yet be small. Something like fifteen new ones are established by the Forestry Commission every year.

Dropping Old Style Calendar.

What is known as the Old Style Calendar, still used by the Greek Orthodox Church, is to be discarded. Thirteen days will be dropped to bring it into line with the calendar of Western Europe.

Early Morning Fire at Odessa.

A very serious fire broke out about 5.30 Monday morning at Odessa and as a result the combined grocery and meat store of Frank Hillier was totally destroyed. Fire was discovered in the back part of the shop and the alarm was immediately given throughout the village, practically everyone turning out to render assistance. The flames made rapid headway and for a time it looked as though buildings nearby would fall prey to the fire also, but the villagers finally succeeded in getting the flames under control. Fire at one time threatened to spread to the Emmons' home nearby and the contents of the house were at once removed to the street, but fortunately the fire was confined o the store. A call was sent to the Kingston Fire Brigade for help shortly after the fire started and a number of men from the brigade were ready to go when a second call received stating that the fire had been put under control. No cause for the fire could be given.

PRESENTATIONS.

Switzerville, June 21st, 1928.

Dear Mr and Mrs. Merrick and Mary :

It is with mingled feelings that we are gathered here to-night—feelings of sadness in losing a beloved pastor, but also feelings of joy in knowing that some other flock is receiving a devoted and untiring pastor.

It is all for the best that such parting should occur, and we assure you that our prayers will follow you in your new field of endeavor.

You came here to a broken circuit. You are leaving a united circuit and have done everything humanely possible to make it so.

You have had your trials, you have met obstacles, but you have met them and overcome them with that undaunted courage so characteristic of Englishmen.

You have been a good soldier of Jesus Christ. Your sermons on each and every Sabbath have been intensely spiritual, always pointing us to our Lord Jesus Christ.

Please accept this little present as a remembrance of the folks in Switzerville and also accept our good wishes for a long and happy ministry in God's vineyard.

May the good Lord, who has sustained you in times past continue to bless you in your work.

Violet, June 22nd, 1928.

To Mr. and Mrs. Merrick and daughter, Mary :

We ,the members and adherents of the Violet United Church of Canada have assembled here to-night, that we may in some small measure express the high esteem in which we have held the services of our pastor, Rev. Mr. Merrick ,and his partner in life.

The six years of your sojourn among us have glided swiftly, pleasantly and may we say, too, profitably away ; and we regret that you are leaving us to take up your duties in a new field of labor. At the same time, we are comforted to know that you will not be so far removed from us but that we shall still hold fast the same loving friendship which now joins us in heart, and hope to meet many times again.

With one accord all unite in invoking God's presence with you in whatever vineyard He may call you to perform the work of the Spirit, and then through all the vicissitudes of life that may or may not chance to come ,all will be well.

We ask you now to accept these gifts as tokens of loving friendship, that they may be memorials to keep ever green a remembrance between us.

To Mrs. and Mr. Merrick we present this electric reading lamp and candle holders ; to Miss Mary we present this ivory clock.

Signed on behalf of the members and adherents of Violet United Church of Canada :

PREPARE FOR SCHOOL

The summer vacation should be used to prepare children for school. Any parents who have been advised by the school physician or the family physician, that their child is in need of medical care, and who have not acted upon the advice, atend to it without further delay.

The parent of a child who will enter school for the first time in the autumn would be well advised to have the child examined by the family physician, in order to find out whether or not he is in need of any treatment.

Now is the time to have any physical defects corrected. The child then has the summer in which to build up his vitality, and will enter school physically fit. There is no question that the child who is physically fit, to begin with, and who leads a regular hygienic life is the one who develops best both physically and mentally.

Children with diseased tonsils, adenoids, diseased teeth, or who require glasses are very definite handicapped. Children who will not receive proper food, sufficient rest, who do not play out of doors are stunted physically and dulled mentally, compared with what they should be.

Children should be vaccinated against smallpox and immunized against diphtheria before starting to school. This should be done in the first year of life, but if it has been neglected, it should be done—NOW.

Questions concerning Health, addressed to the Canadian Medical Association, 184 College Street, Toronto, will be answered by letter. Questions as to diagnosis and treatment will not be answered.

COBOURG-ROCHESTER STEAMSHIP ROUTE. ONTARIO CAR FERRY COMPANY.

Commencing June 30th, the present four days per week service of the Ontario Car Ferry steamers across Lake Ontario, between Cobourg, Ont, and Genesee Dock (Port of Rochester, N. Y.) will be increased to the full summer service of one round trip daily, leaving Genesee Dock in the morning and leaving Cobourg in the afternoon.

The two steamers operating in this service "Ontario No. 1" and "Ontario No. 2" are equipped for the handling of passengers, with splendid wide promenade decks, excellent dining room and buffet service, where meals are served at popular prices, music and dance room, and also some private cabins and staterooms available for the benefit of those who may desire rest or privacy during the trip across the lake. The steamers are also equipped with a "Panatrope" machine—a type of electrically operated gramaphone, providing ample music at all times in various parts of the ships, including the dance room and the dining saloon.

One of the steamers provides the regular scheduled service, Rochester to Cobourg and return, while the other steamer is used to take care of the many special organized excursion parties which, during the summer season, both from the north and south sides of the lake, avail themselves of the pleasures of a day's outing on these fine vessels.

Excellent arrangements have also been made for the handling of tourist automobiles on these steamers.

This route provides a very convenient and attractive short-cut between central Ontario and central New York State points.

Full information, tickets, etc., may be had of any Canadian National Railways' Agent.

Uses of Glass.

Buildings and whole cities of glass are predicted by a well-known architect. There would be two sheets of glass to a high building, eighteen inches or so apart, leaving space to be made into at least a partial vacuum.

Glass buildings would probably be heated and cooled in the same way as a thermos flask is used to maintain heat and cold.

Oranges From Argentine.

Tucuman oranges will in future rival South African fruit in the English market, one of the biggest consumers of oranges in the world.

"Now a certain man was sick named Lazarus of Bethany, the town of Mary and her sister Martha ; (It was that Mary which anointed the Lord with ointment and wiped His feet with her hair, whose brother Lazarus was sick.) Therefore his sisters sent unto Him, saying,"Lord, behold he whom thou lovest is sick." Now Jesus loved Martha and her sister and Lazarus. Then Martha, as soon as she heard that Jesus was coming went and met Him; but Mary sat still in the house. Then said Martha unto Jesus, Lord, if Thou hadst been here, my brother had not died. CANADA'S METAL AGE.

The Canadian Mining World Makes Some Interesting Comments.

Under the caption, "Canada Enters the Metal Age," the Canadian Mining World, published by Stobie, Furlong & Co., editorially makes some interesting comments on the mining industry, and point out that it is entering on the most prosperous era. The editorial follows:

"Canada is just entering her own particular metal age, and developments of the next few years will equal those of any other country of this age. From Atlantic to Pacific, Canadian are mine-conscious as never before, and the tremendous activity which must lead to many great and small producing mines in every direction. The new Dominion of Newfoundland, too, has joined the movement, and developments are under at least one great complex mine, sponsored by the largest mining corporation in the world. That other big ore bodies will be found is almost very certain and in that event Newfoundland will occupy a particularly attractive position in relation to the markets of Europe as her main ports are nearer the other side than New York, for instance, by a quarter of the distance.

"Now and then we hear of so-called leading financiers deprecating the widespread spirit of mine speculation throughout the Dominion, although, we are glad to say, Government officials and many bankers overlook that spirit to some extent, conscious of Canadians in the immense possibilities in the latent metal resources of their country. Naturally some will lose money in individual mining efforts; but, nevertheless, the result, figured in a national way, will be of tremendous benefit.

"Mining capital for out-of-the-way districts can never be raised in a wholesale way except in periods of intense speculation, and that is the case in Canada at this time. Loosening the public purse-strings for metal-mining operations in every province of the Dominion means great prosperity for the nation, as here and there great and small mines add their creations of new wealth to the public gold reserves. Furthermore, the bad and the good, and possibly good, is the great need at such times, and it is to be hoped that efforts of Government officials and financiers will be along those lines, and those only. Any effort to squelch the speculative spirit that is prone to lift off the best metal pot on earth will not be to Canada's advantage. She is just entering the metal age—the most prosperous era of her entire history."

CANADIAN WOMEN'S WORK

BY LUCINDA.

In a recent number of The Canadian Freeman and Catholic Observer, the following were addressed to as sane and kindly advice to girls as we have seen in a long time, The heading was "Ten Commandments for the Modern Girl," and while we cannot give the numerous good things said, we can enumerate the commandments : Don't parade the streets with a dressed up air of no place to go so as to be picked up by the first man who comes along ; always tell your mother where you are going and with whom, and come home in reasonable time. Don't think you are smart in defying conventions, they were made for our protection. Don't accept handsome gifts from men who are no relation. Don't let men treat you to intoxicants in public or in private. Don't attach too much importance to cosmetics and don't wear too conspicuous clothing. Avoid demoralizing dances, if it is possible to dance the modern dance with modesty, if a partner wants to dance in an extreme way get one better. Get out for some form of out-door sport, but don't make a cult of athletics or turn into a tom boy and lose your dainty, feminine charm ; beware of the man who tries to treat you with familiarity on a slight acquaintance ; when you may take it granted that he would do the same with anyone else and is therefore to be avoided. If you are a girl who has a friend who is temperate and steady, invite him to your house and introduce him to your mother and when he comes to see you be at your home and not on a corner. Don't expect to go through life dressed like a doll, but learn to be useful as well as ornamental. Idleness is productive of nothing except failure, disappointment and poverty. These commandments may be kept with advantage, not by Roman Catholic girls alone, but girls who want to gain and keep their own self respect and that of the community in which they live.

Let the children learn to swim this summer. For you who have a cottage or live near the water, this is needless advice. They will learn anyway. But many of us are not near water and to those mothers who are living in an enland locked area we say "let them learn to swim." Now that the motor has made the world small, it is easy enough for anyone who will read this to take the boys and girls out to a safe beach on the shore of a lake and get them used to the water. They will soon learn to swim and will be much more safely equipped for life by doing so. No one should go out in a small boat or canoe who cannot swim. How often we hear of the boy or girl who never learned to be at home in the water, drowning themselves and taking someone who tried to rescue them to destruction. In Eastern Ontario, indeed almost anywhere in Canada, there are lakes and rivers not so far away. The boys and girls will find them, they will go boating safely, if they can swim.

The delegates to the International and Canadian convention of The King's Daughters and Sons recently held in Ottawa, came home with very kindly words to cast upon the reception given in their honor by Their Excellencies, the Governor General and the Viscountess Willingdon. Her Excellency, who has a charming manner, wore a dainty gown of pale yellow georgette and lace and had a hat of yellow with a touch of black lace. Government House was a delight to the visitors, who found the whole lower floor of Rideau Hall thrown open for their comfort and were also able to wander about the lovely grounds and to find the wild flower garden made by Lady Byng of Vimy, who not only gathered flowers from all over Canada for the wild flower garden at Rideau Hall, but took many seeds and roots home with her to England, where she can follow the seasons in Canada by the flowers that bloom in succession. The King's Daughters and Sons is an organization that has been productive of much good in Canada and the United States. To help other, especially by helping them to help themselves, to feed the hungry and visit the sick are among the duties faithfully performed by the members

"When I was a girl I always wanted to look as pretty as, I could," said a smartly young married woman recently, "but some of the girls I see don't seem to care and are perfect frights." She went on to say that she and her husband had been dining at a restaurant and that two girls and a boy had come in to get some thing to eat. "The girls looked dreadful," she said, "One wore a dirty blouse tucked into knickers and a straw hat tied under her chin. Her hair stuck out and her face even looked as if it should be washed. The other girl wore a very short skirt and took off her hat so that we could see her untidy hair. The boy was the neatest of the party. At the table were several girls so prettily and neatly dressed that it was a pleasure to look at them. They too, were motoring, but they wore gay sweaters with kilted skirts that came below the knee, as all smart frocks do now-a-days, their hair was neat and they didn't comb it at the table either. Their sunburnt faces were fresh and just a touch of color and no lipstick. My husband said he saw the boy with the other girls cast an envy glance at this party." Knickers may be all right for mountain climbing or riding, but not the best tailor in the world can make them become-ing. When of cloth they are hot and uncomfortable and no matter what material they are made of, they are ugly.

"Well, Hal," he began, jocosely, but the joking words he would have uttered next died on his lips as he noticed the strange look in Hal's eyes—interest and anxiety on the doctor's face. "What is it?" he asked. "Are all your patients dead?"

"Guy," and the doctor came closely to him, whispering huskily, "you and I are murderers in the first degree. Yes; and both deserve to be hung. Do you remember that Madeline Clyde whom you insulted with your logic and Latin verbs? She'd set her heart on that certificate. She wanted the money, not for new gowns and fooleries, mind, but to help her old grandfather pay his debts. His place is mortgaged. I don't understand it; but he asked some old hanks to lend him the money, and the mortgage, final, whoever he was, refused. I wish I had it. I'd give it to him out and out. But that's nothing to do with the girl—Maddy, they call her. The disappointment killed her, and she is dying—in raving crazy-mad delirious talking of that confounded examination. I tell you, Guy, my inward parts get terribly mixed up when I hear her talk, and my heart thumps like a sledge hammer. That's the reason I have not been up to Aikenside. I wouldn't leave Maddy so long as there was hope. I did not tell them this morning. I couldn't make that poor couple feel worse than they are feeling, but when I looked at her tossing from side to side and picking at the bedclothes, I knew it would soon be over me—that when I saw her again those little arms would be still enough and the bright eyes shut forever. Guy, I couldn't see her die—I don't like to see anybody die, but her, Maddy, of all others—and so I came away. If you stay long enough, you'll hear the bell toll, I reckon. There is none at Hamedale Church, which they attend. They are Episcopalians, you see, and so they'll come up here some day. I hope I shall be dearer than an adder."

Here the doctor stopped, wholly out of breath, while Guy for a moment sat without speaking a single word. Madsie, in his hearing, had told her mother what the sick girl in the doctor's office had said about being poor and wanting the money for grandpa, while Mrs. Noah had given him a rather exaggerated account of Mr. Markham's visit; but he had not connected the two together until now, when he saw the whole, and almost as much as the doctor himself regretted that he had had had in Maddy's illness and her grandfather's distress.

"Doc," he said, laying his hand on the doctor's arm, "I am that old hunks, the miserly rascal who refused the money. I met the old man going home that day, and he asked me for help. You say the place must be sold. It never shall, never. I'll see to that, and you must save the girl."

"I can't, Guy. I've done all I can, and now, if she lives, it will be wholly owing to the prayers that old saint of a grandfather says for her. I never thought much of these things until I heard him pray; not that she should live anyway, but that it might be right, like that. Guy, there's something in such a prayer as that. It's more powerful than all my medicine swallowed at one grand gulp."

Guy didn't know very much about praying then, and so he made no response, but he thought of Lucy Atherstone, whose life was one hymn of prayer and praise, and he wished she could know of Maddy, and that her petitions with those of the grandfather, then, might be intended for him. Presently the brother's laughter mingled merrily of the different things they passed upon the road. But when Guy told her where they were going, and why they were going there, she looked grave at once into her eyes, and hiding her face in Guy's lap, she sobbed bitterly.

"I did like her so much that day," she said, "and she looked so sorry, too. It's terrible to die!"

Then she called Guy with questions concerning Maddy's probable future. "Would she go to heaven, sure?" and when Guy answered in fashion, "Yes," she asked, "How did he know? Had he heard that Maddy was that kind of good which lets folks in heaven? Because, Brother Guy," and the little preacher nestled closely to the young man, fingering his coat buttons as she talked, "because Brother Guy, folks can be good—that is, not do naughty things—and still God won't love them unless they—I don't know what, I wish I did."

Guy drew her nearer to him, but to that childish yearning for knowledge he could not respond, so he said:

"Who taught you all this, little one?—not your mother, surely."

"No, not mamma, but Miriam, the waiting-maid we left in Paris. She told me about it, and taught me to pray different from mamma. Do you pray, Brother Guy?"

The question startled the young man, who was glad his coachman spoke to him just then, asking if he should drive through Devonshire village, or go direct to Honedale by a shorter route.

They would go to the village, Guy said, hoping that thus the doctor might be persuaded to accompany them. This diverted Jessie's mind, and she said no more of praying; but the first tiny grain was sown, the mustard seed, which should hereafter spring up a mighty tree, as the direct result of Maddy's disappointment and almost fatal illness. They found the doctor at home and willing to go with them. Indeed, he had never had he become listening for the first stroke of the bell which was to herald the death he deemed so sure, that he was on the point of mounting his horse and galloping off alone, when Guy's invitation came. It was five miles from Devonshire to Honedale, and when they reached a hill which lay half-way between, they stopped for a few minutes to rest the tired horses. Suddenly, as they sat waiting, a sharp, ringing sound fell on their ears, and grasping Guy's knee, the doctor said, "I told you so; Madeline Clyde is dead."

It was the village bell, and its twice three strokes betokened that it tolled for somebody youthful, somebody young, like Maddy Clyde. Jessie wept silently, but there were no tears in the eyes of the young men, as with bowed heads they sat listening to the slow, solemn sounds which came echoing up the hill. There was a pause; the sexton's dirgelike task was done, and now it only remained for him to strike the age, and tell how many years the departed one had numbered.

"One, two, three, four, five, six, seven, eight, nine, ten." Jessie counted it aloud, when there came a long lull like a heavy blow upon the hearts of the young men, who a few weeks ago knew not that such as Maddy Clyde had lived, and then eleven.

How long it seemed before another stroke, and Guy was beginning to hope they'd heard the last, when again the dull, muffled sound came floating on the air, and Dr. Holbrook, black-bearded, tall, half quivered as he now counted aloud, "One, two, three, four, five."

That was all; there it stopped; and with never all their listenings to catch another note. Fifteen years, and only fifteen had passed over the form now forever still.

"She was fifteen," Guy whispered, remembering distinctly to have heard that number from Maddy herself.

"I thought they told me fourteen, but of course it's she," the doctor rejoined. "Poor child, I would have given much to have saved her."

Jessie did not talk; only once, when she asked Guy if Maddy were gone to heaven, and if he supposed Maddy had got there by this time.

"We'll go just the same," said Guy, "I will do what I can for the old man;" and so the carriage drove on, down the hill, across the meadow-land, and past the wooded knoll whose walls inclosed the stiffened form of him for whom the bell had tolled, the boy, fifteen years of age, who had been the patient of another than Dr. Holbrook.

Maddy was not dead, but the paroxysm which delirium had caused, and she lay now in a heavy sleep so nearly resembling death that they who watched, waited expectantly to see the going out of her last breath. Never before had a carriage like that from Aikenside stopped at that humble cottage, but the neighbors thought it came merely to bring the doctor, whom they welcomed with a glad smile, making a way for him to pass to Maddy's bedside. Guy preferred waiting in the carriage until such time as Grandpa Markham could speak with him, for Jessie had begged of the doctor into the sick room, startling even the grandmother, and causing her to wonder who the richly dressed child could be.

"Dying, doctor," said one of the women affirmatively, not interrogatively; but the doctor shook his head, and holding in one hand his watch, he counted the faint pulse beats as with his eye he measured off the minute.

"There are too many here," he said. "She needs the air you are breathing," and in his quick, authoritative way, he cleared the crowded room of the mistaken friends who were unwittingly breathing up Maddy's very life.

All but the grandparents and Jessie; these he suffered to remain, and sitting down by Maddy, counted for the long sleep was ended. Silently and earnestly the aged couple prayed for their darling, asking that, if possible, she might be spared to cheer and bless their prayers, lifting, at last, the heavy fog from Maddy's brain, and making her as fine and clear in consciousness. It was Jessie who first caught the expression of the opening eyes, and darting forward, she exclaimed: "She's waked up, Dr. Holbrook. She will live."

Wonderingly Maddy looked at her, and then at the old people, uncertain of where they had met before crossed her mind, she smiled and said:

"Where am I now? Have I never come home, and is this Dr. Holbrook's office?"

"No, no; it's home, your home, and you are getting well," the doctor said, bending over the bewildered girl. "Dr. Holbrook has cured you, and Guy is here, and I, and——"

"Hush, you disturb her," the doctor said, gently pulling Jessie away, and himself asking Maddy how she felt.

She did not recognize him. She only had a vague idea that he might be some doctor, but not Dr. Holbrook, sure; not the one who so long had tortured her on a day which seemed now so far behind. From the white-haired man her eyes turned to Guy, and there was a burst of thanksgiving for the life restored, and then Grandpa Markham tottered from the room, out into the open air, where he would have fallen so refreshingly on his tired frame as it fell now, when he first knew that Maddy lived. He did not care for his homestead; that might go, and he still be happy with Maddy left. But He who had marked down the true course for Maddy had another good in store, willing it so that both should come together, even as the disappointments had come hand in hand.

From the soft cushions of his carriage, where he sat reclining, Guy Remington's neck, he heard all that came out, and alighting at once, he accosted him pleasantly, and then walked with him to Grandpa's door, on a rustic bench, built for Maddy beneath the cherry trees, Grandpa Markham sat down to rest. From speaking of Maddy's illness, he began to go back to the day when Guy had first met grandpa, whose application for money he had refused.

"I have thought better of it, since," he said, "and am sorry I did not accede to your proposal. One object of my coming here now was to say that my purse is at your disposal. You can have as much as you wish, paying me whenever you like, and the house will not be sold to Slocum, I understand, holds the mortgage. I will see him to-morrow and stop the whole proceedings."

Guy spoke rapidly, determined to make a clean breast of it, but grandpa understood it not, and bowing his white head upon his bosom, the big tears dropped like rain upon the turf, while his lips quivered, first with thanks to the Providence who had truly done all things well, and next with thanks to his benefactor.

"Blessings on your head, young man, for making me so happy. You are worthy of your father, and he was the best of men."

"My father—did you know him?" Guy asked in some surprise, and then the story came out, how, years before, when a city hotel was on fire, and one of the guests in imminent danger from the locality of his room, and his own nervous fear which made him powerless to act, another guest braved fearlessly the hissing flame, and scaling the tottering wall, dragged out to life and liberty one who, until that hour, was to him an utter stranger.

Pushing back his snowy hair, Grandfather Markham showed upon his temple a long, white scar, obtained the night when he perilled his own life to save that of another. There was a doubly warm pressure now of the old man's hand, as Guy replied, he knew the cheapness of his attire, his pantaloons faded and short, his coat worn threadbare and shabby, his shoes both patched at the toes, his cotton shirt minus a bosom, and so he thought of the humble cottage, with its few rocky acres, he wondered of what he could be proud.

Meantime, for Maddy, Dr. Holbrook had prescribed perfect quiet, bidding them darken again the window from which the shade had been removed, and ordering all save the grandmother to leave the room and let the patient sleep, if possible. Even Jessie was not permitted to stay, though Maddy clung to her as to a dear friend. In a few whispered words Jessie had told her name, saying she came from Aikenside, and that her Brother Guy was there, too, outdoors, in the carriage. "He heard how sick you were at Devonshire, this morning, and drove right home for me to come to see you. I told him of you that day in the office, and that's why he brought me, I guess. You'll like Guy. I know all the girls do—he's so good."

Sick and weary as she was, and unable as yet to comprehend the entire meaning of all she heard, Maddy was conscious of a thrill of pride in knowing that Guy Remington, from Aikenside, was interested in her, and had brought his sister to see her. Winding her feeble arms around Jessie's neck, she kissed the soft, warm cheek, and said, "You'll come again, I hope."

"Yes, every day, if mamma will let me. I don't mind it a bit, if you are poor."

"But, tut, little tattler," and Dr. Holbrook, who, unseen by the children had all the while been standing near, took Jessie by the arm. "What makes you think them poor?"

In the clearly shaded room Maddy could see nothing distinctly, but she heard Jessie's reply: "Because the blustering comes down so low and Maddy's pillows are so teenty, not much bigger than my dolly's. But I love her, don't you, doctor?"

"Prompt," was the darkness the doctor caught the sudden flash of Maddy's eyes, and something impelled him to lay his own broad hand on her forehead, as he replied, "I love all my patients"; then, taking Jessie's arm, he led her out to where Guy was waiting for her.

CHAPTER VI.

Had it not been for the presence of Dr. Holbrook, who accepting Guy's invitation to tea, rode back with him to Aikenside, Mrs. Agnes would have gone off into a passion when told that Jessie had been "exposed to fever and mercy knows what."

"There's no telling what one will catch among the very poor," she said to Dr. Holbrook, as she clasped and unclasped the heavy gold bracelets flashing on her white, round arm.

"I'll be answerable for any disease Jessie caught at Mr. Markham's," the doctor replied.

"At Mr. Who's? What did you call him?" Agnes asked, the bright color on her cheek fading as the doctor replied:

"Markham—an old man who lives in Honedale. You never knew him, of course."

Involuntarily Agnes glanced at Guy in whose eye there was, as she fancied, a peculiar expression. Could it be that the new acquaintance had so carefully? Impossible, she said to herself; but still the white fingers trembled as she handled the china and silver, that for once she was glad when the doctor took his leave, and she was alone with Jessie.

"What was that girl's name?" she asked, "the one you went to see?"

"Maddy, mother—Madeline Clyde. She's so pretty. I'm going to see her again. May I?"

Agnes did not reply directly, but continued to question the child with regard to the cottage which Jessie thought so funny, slanting away back, she said, so that the roof on one side almost touched the ground. The window panes, too, were so very tiny, and the room where Maddy lay sick was small and low.

"Yes, yes, I know," Agnes said at last, impatiently, weary of hearing of the cottage whose humble exterior and interior she knew so much better than Jessie herself.

But this was not to be divulged; for surely the haughty Agnes Remington, who, in Boston, aspired to and in society into which, as the wife of Dr. Remington, she had been admitted, and who, in Aikenside, was looked upon with envy, could have nothing in common with the red cottage or its inmates. So when Jessie asked again if she could not see Maddy on the morrow, she answered decidedly: "No, daughter, no. I do not wish you to associate with such people," and when Jessie pouted in and out, and when the pain and noise in her head was at its highest, a hand, large, and, as it seemed, cool, was laid on her temples, quieting their throbbings, and making the blood course less madly through the swollen veins. Maddy knew that her how kind, how attentive he had been, and to herself she had said: "He's sorry about that certificate. He wouldn't have me think it did not mean to be unkind. Yes; I forgive him; for I really was very stupid that afternoon."

And so, in a most forgiving frame of mind, Maddy submitted to the snowy robe which grandma brought in place of her own, and then wrapping her, and which became her well, with its daintily crimped ruffles about the neck and wrists. Those wrists and hands! How white and pretty they had grown! and Maddy looked, and her grandmother buttoned together the wristbands, to see how loose the wrapper was.

"I have been very sick," she said. "Are my cheeks as thin as my arms?"

They were not, though they looked somewhat pinched and unnatural roundness. Still there was much of childish beauty in the young, eager face, and the hair had lost comparatively none of its glossy brightness.

"That's him," grandma said, as the sound of a horse's gallop was heard, and in a moment the doctor reined up before the gate.

From Mrs. Markham, who met him in the door, he learned that the poor sufferer she was also how "she has been reckoning on this visit, making herself all unwell about it."

Grandma did not say that returning all his old dread of Maddy Clyde. Why should she worry herself into a sweat? What was she in the world different from any other? Nothing, he said to himself, nothing; and yet he, too, had been more anxious about this case than he had ever paid. Depositing his hat and gloves upon the table, he followed Mrs. Markham up the stairs, vaguely conscious of wishing she would stay down, and very conscious of feeling glad; when just at Maddy's door and opposite a low window she espied the hens busily engaged in devouring the yeast cakes with which she had taken so much pains, and which she had placed from the sun to dry. Finding that they paid no heed to her loud "Shoo, shoo," she started herself to drive them away, telling the doctor to go right on and to help himself.

Much perspiration was standing under Maddy's hair by this time, and when the doctor stepped across the threshold, and she knew he really was standing near her, it oozed out upon her forehead in big round drops, while her cheeks glowed with warmth. I suffered two years before I tried Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. I got four bottles at first and it did me a world of good. TIRED, WEAK, NERVOUS WOMAN BENEFITED

Praises Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound

Asbestos Mines, Quebec.—"After the birth of my second child, I was always feeling tired, nervous and weak. I had headaches, backaches and terrible pains every month. I suffered two years before I tried Lydia E. Pinkham's Vegetable Compound. I got four bottles at first and it did me a world of good. I would not be without it in the house now, and have another six bottles in. I recommend it to every woman I know."—Mrs. T. BARRITT, Box 114, Asbestos Mines, Quebec.

Remington that I said I liked him—only that. I thank him. He would think it queer for a poor girl like me to send such word to him. He is very rich, and handsome, and splendid, isn't he?"

"Yes, Guy's rich and handsome, and everybody likes him. We were in college together."

"You were?" Maddy exclaimed. "Then you know him well, and Jessie, and you've been to Aikenside often? There's nothing in the world I want so much as to go to Aikenside. They say it is so beautiful."

"Maybe I'll carry you there some day when you are strong enough to ride," the doctor answered, thinking of his light buggy at home, and wondering he had not used it more, instead of always riding on horseback.

Dr. Holbrook looked much older than he was, and to Maddy he seemed quite fatherly, so that the idea of riding with him, aside from the honor it might be to her, struck her queerly, as riding with Farmer Green would have done. The doctor, too, imagined that his proposition was prompted solely from disinterested motives, but he found himself wondering how long it would be before Maddy would be able to ride a little distance, just over the mill and back. He was tiring her all out talking to her; but somehow it was very delightful even in his sick room, with the summer sunshine stealing through the window and falling upon the soft reddish-brown head resting on the pillow. Once he fixed those pillows, arranging them so nicely that grandma, who had come in from her hens and chickens, declared "she was as handy as a woman," and after receiving a few general directions with regard to the future, "guessed he'd better be hurry, she'd leave him with Maddy a spell, as there were a few chores she must do."

The doctor knew that at least a dozen individuals were waiting for him that moment; but still he was in no hurry to be said, and so for half an hour longer he sat there talking of Guy and Jessie, and Aikenside, answering how he had never before observed how very becoming a white wrapper was to sick girls like Maddy Clyde. Had he been asked the question, he could not have told whether his other patients were habited in buff, or brown, or tan color; but he knew all about Maddy's garb, and thought the dainty frill around her slender throat the prettiest "puckered piece" that he had even seen. Now, then, was Dr. Holbrook losing his heart to that little girl of fourteen, and a half? He did not think so. Indeed he did not think anything about his heart, though thoughts of Maddy Clyde were pretty constantly with him, as after leaving her he had his round of visits.

The Aikenside carriage was standing at Mrs. Conner's gate when he returned, and Jessie came running out to meet him, followed by Guy, while Agnes, in the most becoming riding habit, sat by the window, looking as unconcerned at his arrival as if it were not the very event for which she had been impatiently waiting. Jessie was a great pet with the doctor, and, lifting her lightly in his arms, he kissed her forehead where the golden curls were clustering and said to her:

"I have seen Maddy Clyde. She asked for you, and why you do not come to see her, as you promised."

"Mother would not let me," Jessie answered. "She says they are not fit associates for a Remington."

There was a touch of contempt on the doctor's face, and a gleam of wrath in Agnes' eyes as she motioned Jessie to be silent, and then graciously received the visitor, who by this time was in the room. As if determined to monopolize the conversation, she began at once to dwell on the Markhams, Agnes rattle on for nearly fifteen minutes, scarcely allowing Guy a chance for uttering a word. But Guy had a word to say, and seized the first favorable opportunity to inquire after Madeline.

She was improving rapidly, the doctor said, adding: "You ought to have seen her delight when I gave her your bouquet."

"Indeed," and Agnes bridled haughtily. "I did not know that Guy was in the habit of sending bouquets to such as this Clyde girl. I must must report him to Miss Atherstone."

Guy's scat was very near to Agnes, and while a cloud overspread his fine features, he said in a low tone, sadly:

"Please say in your report that the worst thing about this Clyde girl is that she adores Miss Esther, and possibly a governess."
